Our work has been done with very high powers (Zeiss obj. r 4 and No. 12 Zeiss compensating oculare). The nephridia of the two Actinotrochx have much the same structure, but in Species A. we have been unable to find that the internal end of the nephridial canal branches, while in Species B. the internal end divides into two short branches. Figs. 52, 52a, 52b represent thi-ee transverse sections through the anterior part of the nephridium of Species B. Fig. 52 is through the nephridial canal just posterior to its internal end. If a section is taken in a longitudinal direction through the nephridial canal and its excretory processes (fig. 52/), it is seen that the distinct walls of the nephridial canal disappear when the bouquet of excretory cells is reached, but that the end is blind and that it is merely a thin walled...
