Excerpt: .pinafores, were sprawling about the mud floor and on the doorstep, engaged in mysterious occupations only understood by themselves. Ach, but the bread is beautiful! said Katootje, addressing herself in a voice that would have been clearly audible half a mile away. Tant Gezina herself couldn t bake it better. Kinders! what a grand dinner we shall have to-day! The children looked up eagerly and left off playing to listen. Fresh bread--ach, the dear good Oom Pieter to bring us that sack of meal--and the fresh butter that Boetie Edouard bought for a treat, and a whole basinful of pumpkin besides--there s a nice dinner for you! Give me fresh bread and butter and I ask nothing better! The prospect of the dinner proved too much for the patience of the second youngest Vermeer, who forthwith began to demand an earnest of the feast. Wait, my kind; you ll get it soon enough! said Katootje, going to the next room and emerging again with a bundle of clothes on her head. With uplifted voice the infant pressed his demands. You ll bur n your tongue and get a stomach-ache from the hot bread, said his mother. Come and play outside while I do the washing. There are Lida and Thysie coming with the water. Ach, ja, it s the truth; I m poor and I ve often had a hard time--but what a happiness that I have such good children that are such a...
