Not illustrated. 1816 Excerpt: .All the inconveniences arising from dependencies are known; their fears, their delays, their jealousies. Those who have to act with them, can never inspire them with the same opinions, nor make them do what is necessary. Every thing must submit to those at the head of affairs. Prussia will be feebly supported by the Confederation of the North of Germany. In future, it will be difficult to calculate on a perfect agreement between her, and what remains of Saxony, as an independent state. The acquisition of Swedish Pomerania adds but little to the real strength of Prussia. It was merely well that she should possess it, as it was proper that Sweden should give it up. Prussia is no longer the enemy of Austria; and, for the future, Russia will make them allies. Former jealousies have disappeared before greater dangers; for in this instance the contest is not, as it formerly was, about some trifling pre-eminence, but for existence itself, uniformly menaced by Russia. Under a proper system, Prussia ought never to have passed the Rhine; for by that step she becomes the enemy of France, an alliance with whom should be the pivot of her policy; not on the score of Austria, as it formerly was, but on that of Russia. The Prussians and the French are no longer destined to fight on the plains of Rosbach or Jena, but to afford mutual succour and prevent the Russians meeting them in those places. Prussia ought...
