The work which Thou hast wrought we beg that Thou shalt keep Against an evil day perchance ourselves may bring. Keep off the storms which counter currents often raise; Fast chain our foolish passion s passing gales within, Nor let them, raging, move apart the stones just set, And scatter ruin where now our house so stately stands. Oh, let there be no fool s harsh word on land or sea, Which gathers force ofttimes with good men off their guard, And makes them act more foolishly than he who threw The brand which fired their souls with false and base alarms. Oh, let there be no Prejudice, in North or South, Vile bird that casts its feathered darts from off its back, To wound with brazen claws and wings and hideous beak, And feed on human...
